

First published 1995 by
FREMANTLE PRESS

First edition reprinted 1998.
Second edition published 2017. Reprinted 2018, 2020.

This edition first published 2026.

Fremantle Press Inc. trading as Fremantle Press
PO Box 158, North Fremantle, Western Australia, 6159
fremantlepress.com.au

Copyright © Dave Warner, 1995

The moral rights of the author have been asserted.

This book is copyright. Apart from any fair dealing for the purpose of private study, research, criticism or review, as permitted under the Copyright Act, no part may be reproduced by any process without written permission. Every reasonable effort has been made to seek permission for quotations contained herein. Please address any enquiries to the publisher.

Front cover photograph: Matt Outt-Art, 'The Old Power House'
Printed by Everbest Printing Investment Limited, China.

A catalogue record for this book is available from the National Library of Australia

ISBN 9781760997328 (paperback)
ISBN 9781925162332 (ebook)

Fremantle Press is supported by the Western Australian State Government through the Department of Cultural Industries, Tourism and Sport.

Fremantle Press respectfully acknowledges the Whadjuk people of the Noongar nation as the Traditional Owners and Custodians of the land where we work in Walyalup.

DAVE
WARNER
CITY OF LIGHT

FREMANTLE PRESS

To Mabel and Gus Warner

PART ONE: 1979

CHAPTER 1

The two-bar radiator was fighting a losing battle with the bone-aching cold that was the morning of August third, 1979. Maybe it would have been adequate in one of those dogboxes Barry Dunn was making a fortune out of building up in the northern suburbs, but in our convict-built station house, all limestone and wood, nothing short of a blast furnace had a chance of success.

You could have played a basketball game in here. In fact we had, New Years Day, when the streets of Fremantle had finally ceased being molested by drunken sailors, dings in supercharged Valiants and normally law-abiding citizens letting off steam on that one night of the year they felt obliged.

But that had been summer, when your blood pumped and you felt alive. On this dark morning, the breeze bit and howled like two sheilas at an office party gone wrong, and I just wanted to curl up and sleep.

On duty forty-five minutes, I'd already brewed myself two cups of tea and a coffee. I'd have made toast but the only bread left was curled, cardboard-dry and the colour of grass. I contemplated asking the uniformed boys for some of theirs but I knew they'd resent it and, right now, they were nowhere in sight.

Wind whistled through gaps in the sash-windowsills but otherwise the station was silent as a jockey on a good thing. Dragging myself from the heater, I went back to forage in the same Gladstone bag that had faithfully served my grandfather for his last twenty years on the wharf. This morning it yielded an apple and a gladwrapped ham and tomato sandwich. What the hell, I could get another sandwich when the shops opened.

As my frozen fingers struggled with the wrapping, I peered through the windowpane. Its layers of dirt had smudged under the streaky rain, but down at the end of Essex Street I could make out white caps on a churning sea.

I hoped the weather would keep up till Saturday. Purely selfish, of course. I played better in the wet. Not that they'd ever keep me in for Peakey once his hamstring was right. I was still considered a reserves player, not quite good enough yet for a regular game. Still, Simmo hadn't been travelling too well lately, and coach Smithy might just go for my endeavour over Simmo's skill. But here I was, Thursday morning and acting like I was already named. Better not count my chickens. It was training tonight and who knew what might happen? Simmo'd probably try and cork me again. Little prick.

More hungry than angry, I tore into the sandwich. I guess I was in la-la land, because when the phone shrieked, all I could think was that it was Smithy confirming my place in the team.

'Fremantle CIB, Detective Constable Lane,' I answered.

'You better come quick.' The voice was raspy, not young, uneducated.

'Who is this, please?'

'Sam Molloy.'

The horse trainer? 'What's it concern, Mr Molloy?'

'Jesus Christ. I found one.'

You could taste the strain in his voice. Somehow I knew. 'You found a body, Mr Molloy?'

'Yep. I'm between South Beach and Coogee. You'll see my wagon with the horse float hitched.'

'Don't move, on my way.'

I hung up, wondering if I should call Homicide. Molloy had been badly shaken but that didn't necessarily mean he'd come across one of Mr Gruesome's efforts. It could just be a drowning victim. Body washed up, blue and bloated. Call Homicide over something like that, you'd never hear the end of it. Where the hell were the uniforms when you needed them? I grabbed my jacket and ditched the sandwich. Suddenly I didn't feel much like eating.

The Commodore took a minute to warm and catch. I gunned south down the coast road past the brooding outline of the South Fremantle Power Station. The sky was just lightening, the sea choppy and black.

A couple of ks on from the power station, a white station wagon and horse float were pulled off the road behind some low sandhills. Propped against the flank of his car, hunched in a check fleecy jacket, was Molloy. He glanced up when I stopped, then turned back to his rollie. From his left hand dangled a long rein attached to chestnut horse. A dog of the loyal-mutt variety sat at Molloy's feet.

As I tried to climb out of the car, I found myself fighting the wind tooth and nail for the door. It was a mean, vicious day all right, but the bumps that were rising on my skin didn't have much to do with the elements.

Even the Trojans had more luck with horses than I did. Many of the losing ones I'd backed had been trained by Molloy, whom I recognised from TV. Stocky, with thick greying hair, he had the wizened skin characteristic of so many in the racing game.

I pretended like I didn't know him. 'Mr Molloy?'

He nodded and flicked away the cigarette. The breeze strangled the fag before it hit sand. He narrowed his eyes. 'You the footballer?'

'Yes.'

'My nephew plays for South. Steve Parlane.'

'I know Steve.'

He nodded again. The delay was making me tingle with fear and excitement.

'Inside the shed.' With a jerk of his stubbly chin, he indicated a long, rambling structure of wood and tin about five hundred metres off. I guessed we both knew it was part of the now disused Robb Jetty abattoirs, but neither of us seemed anxious to dwell on the irony. 'I was taking Sid'—evidently the horse—'for a frolic when Katty here disappeared.' The dog looked guilty at its lapse. 'I went to investigate. Wish to God I never had.'

I started towards the shed and Molloy followed. I wondered why he didn't box the horse. 'You don't have to come,' I told him. 'It's okay. I won't be goin' in.'

We trudged along the bitumen in silence. The grey was lifting, and the US Fleet which had been anchored off Gage Roads for the last few days, was now clearly visible. I wondered what life on the high seas might be like and pushed my doubled body into the fierce breeze. A car passed us with its lights ablaze, and I wondered what the driver would make of the sight of two men, a horse and dog shuffling along the road that bleak morning. Since I was wearing the suit, I would probably get made for the trainer. I wondered what it was like to be a horse trainer. I wondered anything but what deep down I was really wondering—what was in this place and how was I going to cope?

When we reached the building, which was boarded up and vandalised, Molloy took a right turn and walked down its flank. We were heading towards the sea, across what had been a car park. Trapped in potholes was the rain of the previous forty-eight hours, dark as strong tea.

Molloy stopped at a recessed concrete doorway that smelled of urine. A wire gate, evidently useless for a time, hung crazily from one good hinge.

Molloy looked me in the eye. 'I hope you've got a strong stomach.'

I stepped into gloom. This part of the building had no windows, but up towards the road end, a few shafts of light penetrated. Probably some of the roofing tin had given way.

'You want my torch?' Molloy's voice was comforting. He was only about a metre away but it seemed like a furlong.

'Thanks.' I backed a step and saw the small torch offered through the doorway. Whatever he'd seen, Molloy wasn't keen on a repeat.

The light helped. At the beach end of the rectangular building—broken bottles, tins, takeaway food containers. I played the beam straight ahead. Graffiti. An upturned forty-four-gallon drum.

Mess. Swivelling the torch to the left, I illuminated a brick wall that jutted about a metre and a half into the room and blocked what lay immediately behind it.

I took a deep breath and went around. Anticlimax. More rubbish. Then five metres further on, another jutting semi-wall like the one I'd just rounded. Obviously the building had been sectioned for some reason. I walked and turned.

She was prone on the concrete apron. At least her naked torso and legs were. Her head was staring back at me, severed and fitted back-to-front, like a doll whose head had been twisted one-eighty degrees. The face was swollen, distorted, the eyes like glass. Blood had congealed on the floor in pools. One arm was tucked under the stomach; the other, also severed, was propped against a corner of the wall.

Fighting the urge to chuck, I forced myself to examine the concrete floor. No obvious weapon. A handbag, marooned in blood. Shoes. Underwear.

It wasn't till I turned to go back that I noticed. High up on the brick protrusion, in blood, had been written 'U-Jean.'

Outside, Molloy was waiting. 'Mr Gruesome?' I was too busy keeping down the puke to reply.

I went back to the car and radioed for the Homicide boys. They said they were on their way and ordered me back to the scene. I called Fremantle Station and got young Dewey. He and Porter had been called out to help some wharfies and Yanks blueing at the Australia's early morning session. I ordered him to get down here asap but didn't tell him why.

As I cruised back to the abattoir, a Mercedes sedan passed me, veered across the side of the road to where Molloy was standing with the horse, and skidded to a gravelly halt. The door of the Merc swung open and a small, thickset man charged at Molloy, gesticulating the way men with short forearms and shorter tempers do. This was somebody else I had no difficulty recognising.

‘You were supposed to be back at the stables forty minutes ago. I’m a busy man, Sam.’

Molloy gestured my way. The man turned, animosity softening to defiance when he saw what I was. ‘What’s the matter? Bloke has to use his indicators at six in the friggin’ morning?’

‘Have to use them anytime, Mr Dunn, but that’s not what this is about.’

His eyes narrowed. He felt emboldened but he was still guarded: if that wasn’t what I wanted, what was? ‘What is it? Need a permit to train a horse on the beach, now?’

‘Nothing like that, Mr Dunn.’

‘Katty found a body,’ put in Molloy.

‘What?’

I shot Molloy a look to keep his trap shut.

‘A fucking body?’ said momentarily bewildered. Then, ‘That’s not my problem.’

I took my cue. ‘No, it’s not. Mr Molloy, though, must remain till the Homicide Squad arrives.’

‘Homicide?’

This time Molloy didn’t embellish.

‘And what’s supposed to happen to Ceremony?’ Dunn demanded. ‘Fuckin’ horse is catching its death out here. Saturday he’s twos-on in the Stakes, and if he doesn’t win all hell breaks loose and your lot haul me up and chuck me out of racing for four months. Who the hell are you and where are you from, anyway?’

In my five years on the Force I’d never been spoken to this way. But I was too stunned or overwhelmed by this little man’s brazenness to do anything but give him my name and rank.

‘Lane? I’ve heard your name somewhere?’

‘He plays footy for East,’ offered Molloy.

Dunn nodded slowly. He was president of our arch rivals, South Fremantle, but I doubted he ever actually watched his team play.

'I'm sure we don't need the horse, Mr Dunn. If you'd like to load it up, you're quite free to take it back to the stables yourself.'

Dunn looked at me the way a bride might look at a stain on her wedding dress. Molloy saw it and his eye twinkled for an instant.

'A fucking murder. You wouldn't believe it. And you had to find the body.' Dunn turned on Molloy, who pointed out that it was actually Katty who'd done the finding.

'I'm afraid I'll have to ask you to leave, Mr Dunn,' I said, with as much authority as a UN resolution.

'Gotta go anyway. He gonna be all right?' He indicated Ceremony but he was looking at Molloy.

'Sure. He loves it out here,' replied the trainer.

'Right. I'll speak to you later. You playing Saturday, Lane?'

'Maybe.'

'I'll keep an eye out for you. If you're playing well, I'll ask Timmy Wittenoom to give you a couple.' Dunn chuckled. Wittenoom was a Thursday Islander with biceps the size of my thigh, and a serious defect in his ability to distinguish between an opponent and the ball.

I tried to smile tough. Dunn climbed into the Mercedes, U-turned and sped back towards Fremantle. The wind had lost none of its ferocity.

'How old is he?' I asked Molloy.

'Forty-one,' he replied. 'He's a good bloke to work for. Interferes now and again but most of the time leaves it up to you.'

'Okay, Mr Molloy ...'

'Call me Sam.'

'All right, Sam, we better get down to it.' I explained that he would have to give me a statement, even though the Homicide fellas would go through it all again.

Molloy had arrived as usual around 5.00 am. He'd ridden the horse up the beach as far as the power station, then turned and walked it back. He'd seen nobody the whole time, but, of course, the sandhills obscured the road so there could have been passers-by. After a time he'd noticed that Katty was missing. He remembered the dog running up toward the old abattoir building and had gone to investigate. He heard the dog barking inside and was worried some wino might have been tormenting it.

Before Molloy could elaborate, the sound of rubber on sandy bitumen made us look up. It was Dewey in the panel van.

'G'day Snowy, what's up?' he asked in his pimply voice. (Snowy's the name some wag had given me at training camp the year before. My hair is thick and jet black.)

'Go stand guard over by the shed there. If anybody asks anything, say nothing.'

He was hurt at not being let in on the whole story. I could tell by the way his mouth pouted and he flipped on his cap. Being a big-hearted softy, I relented. 'There's a corpse in there.'

His eyes widened. I turned back to Molloy. 'When you went in, did you move anything? Touch anything?'

'Are you kidding?'

Molloy had taken one look at the scene and run outside. He had remembered there was a phone box a kilometre up the road and it took him about five minutes to ride there. He figured that would be quicker than boxing the horse, then driving.

I knew his call had hit the station at 6.08 am, I'd written it in the log. That meant he must have found the body just before six. To my question about other vehicles in the vicinity, he replied that one or two cars might have passed him while he was waiting for me but he couldn't be sure, not in the state he'd been in. He was definite that he'd seen no cars about when he first came down to the beach.

I wondered if he would have seen anything from way up near the power station. He assured me he would have spotted any cars, so long as they'd been burning headlights. At 5.00 am it was pitch black down there. That's why he carried the torch.

A loud crunching signalled the arrival of the Homicide crew.

'You Lane?' The D who asked was a couple of inches shorter than me, about five-eleven. When he held his hand out, I noticed his fists were big and his shoulders powerful. His partner was a gaunt man, tall. 'I'm Dave Holland,' the D told me. 'This is Maurie Talbot.'

'This is ...' I began to introduce Molloy but Holland cut me short.

'Yeah, we know who this is.' I wasn't sure if the bitterness in his voice was mock. 'This is the guy who never trains a winner when you bet on his horses.' Talbot's lips parted in what I guessed was his version of a smile. Suddenly Holland relaxed. 'Pretty in there?' He offered a cigarette to Molloy, who declined.

The trainer indicated me. 'Don't he get one?'

'Nah, he's a footballer.'

How'd he know?

Holland anticipated my question. 'Nobody your age makes Freo CIB unless he can play footy.' Again that hard-bitten charm was turned on Molloy. 'He do right by you?'

'Sure.'

'You get his statement?' To me this time.

I nodded, hoping I hadn't missed anything.

'Okay Sam, you can go and get that horse out of the cold. We know how to get hold of you.'

Holland and I trudged off toward the shed, when Holland suddenly stopped and turned back to Molloy. 'This thing running Saturday?'

'In the Stakes.'

'He gonna win?'

There was a deadpan look from Molloy. 'The owner thinks so.'

Holland took a drag on his cigarette, almost managing to keep his smile to himself. I introduced Dewey who was standing stiff as a Dutch porn actor.

'Okay, let's do it.' Holland crushed the cigarette under his heel, then ordered Dewey to put the butt in his pocket so the Forensic boys wouldn't get confused.

'Where is Forensic?' asked Talbot. 'They should be here by now.'

'I wanted a look first,' said Holland. 'I held the call to them for five minutes.' He saw the warning in Talbot's eyes as they swung from me back to him. 'Don't worry, he isn't gonna rat on us.'

Presuming I was welcome, I followed them into the shed. I grabbed Dewey's torch and passed it to Holland. 'Up there on the left.' I felt like commentator on a macabre bus tour. 'This place used to be an abattoir.'

'What do you mean, used to be?' cracked Holland. Then I heard the intake of breath.

'Jesus,' whistled Talbot, 'he's getting worse.'

I couldn't bring myself to look again.

'Fresh,' said Talbot.

'Last night, I reckon.'

'There's some writing on the wall there,' I offered.

The light hit me full in the face. 'Don't breathe a word of that to a fucking living soul, Lane. Did the uniform see it?'

'He hasn't been in.'

The torch left me and played on U-Jean. 'What about Molloy?'

'Didn't mention it in his statement. I think he took a quick look and skedaddled. It's Mr Gruesome, isn't it?'

'Or his twin fucking brother.'

I knew some of the circumstances surrounding the two previous murders. At least what they'd circulated to the stations. Both victims had been prostitutes in their early twenties. One had been found in bush at Chittering Brook, bashed and then incinerated. The other had been found in a city park, decapitated, the head placed atop a drinking fountain. No leads.

'That writing at all the murder scenes?' I asked.

'Forget you ever saw it,' muttered Talbot.

We stepped back outside and into heavy rain. Normally I'd have prayed it continue, but after what I'd seen in there, thought of a god seemed horribly optimistic.

CHAPTER 2

The rain was still sheeting Saturday as I ran out onto the ground. Despite a poor Thursday showing on the track, I was in the team. Smithy had given me heaps of instructions but I was too churned up to remember what the hell they were.

Murder must have been good for my game. I had eleven possessions in the first quarter, and was heading for a repeat in the second when Simmo chipped one of those lousy little punts of his high into the air—leaving Yours Truly camped underneath with something black and the size of Sydney approaching head-on at twice the speed of sound. The world stood still. I saw Wittenoom launch off the ground, saw the forearm rise and charge inevitably at my head. I won't say I didn't have a choice. I could have turned my back and let him crash into me. Then we would almost certainly have lost possession, and forevermore I would be labelled a gutless wonder. On the other hand, I could stand there, almost take the mark, and certainly take the punishment.

I was stupid, I did the latter. I felt the inside of my skull reverberate and swell like someone had pumped it full of concrete, then I spent the next hour in the bowels of the change room trying to remember being carried off. Even from down there you knew it was a tight game. The surging roar of the crowd washed in every so often, as the trainers reluctantly took turns to drop in on me. They wanted to get back out for the action.

Halfway through the last quarter, I felt well enough to stagger up the steps to the bench. We were holding a ten-point lead. Five minutes later we were two points down and Jeff Munroe had been carted off with a broken collarbone. Then Ken Judge, our best forward, twisted an ankle and hobbled into a pocket, virtually out of the game.

They turned down my offer to go on. I guess they reckoned a one-legged Judge was better than a semiconscious Lane. Sixty seconds later they had no real choice. Wittenoom, this time with a perfectly legit hip-and-shoulder, wiped out our wingman. As he left on a stretcher, I ran back on.

Wittenoom picked me up from the interchange line. 'Back for more punishment Snowy?' he asked through those gappy teeth.

'Don't worry, Timmy,' I said. 'I'll get you.'

'You better hurry, you only got three minutes.'

'Oh no, I got plenty of time.'

When the ball came our way, I tried to sprint. My legs felt like plasticine. Wittenoom was fast for a big guy but, surprisingly, he didn't get away from me. Probably he was dog-tired. He reached the ball first, picked it up, and was about to hook a little footpass to one of their guys standing alone in the goal mouth. At the crucial moment my legs simply gave out from under me, but as I sprawled forward, I somehow managed to drop right into the trajectory of Wittenoom's kick.

The ball thudded into my chest and bounced fifteen metres away to where Simmo stood on his own. I couldn't be sure but I guessed it was his man who had been standing loose. One thing about Simmo, if you give him a chance to be a lair he won't let you down. The little turd sprinted down the wing, bouncing the ball three times. Two South Fremantle players ran at him—a cardinal error—and Simmo was able to lob the ball over their heads to Judge, who scooped it up and hobbled towards the goals, with a flock of South players bearing down fast. Judge's dribbled kick skidded through just ahead of the siren. East Fremantle victors, Snowy Lane a hero.

Later, after the coach had done his locked doors bit which included pointing out to the rest of the boys my exemplary courage in not only going back on the ground but throwing myself on Wittenoom's boot—I was standing in the South Fremantle Members' Bar, having the customary after-match ale, wincing from the two-hundredth backslap.

‘I told you I’d get Timmy to fill you in if you were playing well.’
Dunn was in his official blazer, nursing a clear spirit drink with a lemon twist.

‘Thanks.’ My eye was closing faster than a hungry car salesman and my jaw felt like it had rusted shut.

‘Sorry if I came on a bit strong the other morning.’ He gazed remorsefully into his drink.

I suddenly remembered. ‘How’d the horse do?’

His face brightened. ‘Won in a canter. You on him?’

The excitement of the game had wiped it from my mind. I shook my head.

‘There’s always next time.’

Before I knew what was happening, Dunn was pressing a Scotch into my hand and telling me I didn’t get the games I should do at East. ‘If you ever want to come over here to South, I’ll make sure you do.’

‘That ought to be for the coaches to decide.’

He looked me straight in the eye. ‘“Ought to be” ain’t “is”. If Smithy had his way, you’d be in every week. Think about it.’

In spite of myself, I swallowed. I had always suspected I didn’t sit right with few of the committee men. But then, maybe Dunn was winding me up. ‘Well, I like to play on the winning side,’ I finally countered.

He let that go. ‘How would you like to earn a bit of spare cash?’

Immediately I thought ‘corruption.’ What was left of my eye must have given away my horror.

Dunn quickly disarmed me. ‘Nothing like that. I’m hosting a party. I need security.’

‘I’m pretty busy.’

‘Two hundred cash.’

Much more than I’d expected. There was no departmental line against this kind of thing, and the uniforms did it all the time. But I was still guarded. ‘Why not use Timmy?’

The small man's eyes danced. 'My neighbours never see a black person 'cept on Kojak. I put Timmy in my street, the neighbours'd have their balls on a platter yelling "take them". Then they'd want mine. Sad but true. Here's my personal number. Call me.' He tapped me on the shoulder the way bookies do with old-timers, then hustled off.

The Members' Bar had been steadily thinning. My compatriots were bailing out for that weekly night on the town that was the only break in a regimen of training, sprained ankles and groin strains. Chasing tail was important to all of us, but to me especially. Three months ago I'd busted up with Michelle, my childhood sweetheart. I hadn't been bedded since. I was carrying more semen than the US carrier out there in Gage Roads, but with my face like mince, I reckoned it would be a week before the drought broke. Still, you had to try.

As I bent to pick up my bag, a pair of shoes came into my blurred vision. Being men's shoes, they didn't interest me right off.

'Good game, Snowy.' It was the Homicide cop, Dave Holland, dressed casual in a sweater and slacks. At his side was a little girl, about ten, I guess. 'This is my daughter, Natasha.'

'Call me Tash,' she said promptly.

I was a bit ill-at-ease around children. 'Do you like footy, Tash?'

'Not much.'

'Her mother's getting us a drink. Would you like to join us?'

I cautioned that it might not be for long, and followed Holland to a different section of the bar where young men of previous generations stood with chests proudly puffed, looking down from gilt frames.

'You go help your mum,' Holland ordered his kid. 'Tell her to get a middie for Snowy.'

I guessed Holland must have been my age when Tash was born. It blew me out. I couldn't imagine being a father. 'Just the one?' I indicated his daughter.

'One's enough, believe me,' he said, then changed tack. 'I was sorry I didn't get back to you Friday. It was a hell of a thing to see, and you conducted yourself well.'

'Thanks.'

'You had any nightmares? That sort of thing?'

'No,' I answered truthfully. 'I keep trying not to think about it.'

'First time is real rough. Place like Perth, it doesn't happen often, so none of us gets a chance to become immune. I vomited my heart out at the first one in the hills. Anyway, reason I came down here today wasn't just the footy. Bernie Williams is Homicide super. He wants you on the task force.'

For a local CIB cop to get put on a Homicide task force was like winning the Sandover Medal. Holland read my thoughts. 'Your head's already swollen enough,' he joked. 'It's no big deal. You'll do the shit work down here. Take a uniform with you and go knocking on doors ...'

He broke off as an attractive woman in her thirties approached, balancing beers. Natasha was too busy sucking on a lemonade to be of much assistance. 'My wife, Sue.'

'Hello, Snowy.' She turned a radiant smile on me as I stood. 'Nasty-shirt front you copped.'

'It was a forearm, actually.' I took my beer, sat back and began to relax. They were nice to be around. Not bullshit types.

'Dave tells me you're on the task force.'

'Apparently. I'm sure he had a bit to do with that.'

She threw him a sideways smirk which indicated that indeed he had.

'Did you see Dunn?' I asked Holland.

'Dunn makes sure people see him.'

'He offered me some work.'

'Take it,' said Sue. 'Cop's pay is nothing.'

'Yeah,' said Holland, Natasha jiggling into his lap. 'Just don't tell Bernie Williams about it.'

'I didn't think it was against regulations.'

'It's not. But Williams is a Compton man. He hates Dunn's guts.'

‘Alan Compton?’

‘Yeah, Alan Compton, patron of the Liberal Party, lives up in the hills, family been virtually running this State since Federation, that Compton.’

Sue looked at her husband and indicated me with a nod of the head. ‘Oh, he’s green.’ Then she leant forward on the small wobbly table, hands clasped in front of her. ‘Snowy,’ she said, ‘once you’re in head office you’re involved in politics. Dunn’s an upstart and he supports the Labor Party. Assistant Commissioner Feeney is his man. It’s safe to say Dunn has got the Motor Vehicle Squad and the Fraud Squad on his side. But the big one’s the Vice Squad. And that’s always been under Compton’s influence.’

Bernie Williams had been Vice before Homicide. I did know that much.

Dave looked at me with deliberate eyes. ‘It won’t affect you much now, but later, if you stay in the force, you’ll have to live with it every day.’

At that moment half the team appeared at our table and demanded I go with them to Swan’s disco. I would have preferred the Charles and some hot R’n’B from the Elks, or Warner at the Shents, though it would probably be full house already. Disco wasn’t my scene—the girls had spray-on jeans and bouffants, the guys were imitation John Travoltas. But it was a group thing, so I said my goodbyes to the Hollands, stood up, and geared myself to go once more into the breach.

‘Monday, nine am sharp,’ barked Dave, toasting me with his glass.